

Author's Accepted Manuscript

Cancer predisposition syndromes associated with myeloid malignancy

Emily Quinn, Kim E. Nichols

PII: S0037-1963(17)30044-6

DOI: <http://dx.doi.org/10.1053/j.seminhematol.2017.04.003>

Reference: YSHEM50910

To appear in: Seminars in Hematology

Cite this article as: Emily Quinn and Kim E. Nichols, Cancer predisposition syndromes associated with myeloid malignancy, Seminars in Hematology, <http://dx.doi.org/10.1053/j.seminhematol.2017.04.003>

This is a PDF file of an unedited manuscript that has been accepted for publication. As a service to our customers we are providing this early version of the manuscript. The manuscript will undergo copyediting, typesetting, and review of the resulting galley proof before it is published in its final citable form. Please note that during the production process errors may be discovered which could affect the content, and all legal disclaimers that apply to the journal pertain.

CANCER PREDISPOSITION SYNDROMES ASSOCIATED WITH MYELOID MALIGNANCY

Emily Quinn, MS, CGC and Kim E. Nichols, MD

Department of Oncology, St. Jude Children's Research Hospital, Memphis TN 38105

Address correspondence to:

Kim E. Nichols, MD

Division of Cancer Predisposition

St. Jude Children's Research Hospital

262 Danny Thomas Drive

Memphis, TN 38105

Tel: 901-595-8385

Fax: 901-595-6086

Kim.nichols@stjude.org

1. ABSTRACT

The majority of myeloid malignancies are caused by sporadic somatic events rather than cancer predisposition. Nonetheless, the identification of hereditary cancer predisposition syndromes is critical when caring for patients with myeloid malignancies since detection may direct decisions related to cancer treatment and surveillance. A positive genetic test result also has important implications for other family members who can use this information to undergo their own testing

Download English Version:

<https://daneshyari.com/en/article/5664423>

Download Persian Version:

<https://daneshyari.com/article/5664423>

Daneshyari.com