Highlights

- This exploratory study examined the role of inner speech in the experience of auditory verbal hallucinations (AVHs) and delusions.
- Greater levels of dialogic inner speech were found in participants with psychosis compared to non-clinical controls.
- Greater levels of dialogic inner speech reported better relations both with and between their voices.
- Qualitative narratives also highlighted the tangled dynamics of inner speech, AVHs and delusions.
- These results underscores the need for phenomenological and clinical research into the potential interrelatedness of inner speech, voices and delusions, and the complexities involved in disentangling this network of inner experience.
