Highlights

- Changing role of parental cultural and economic capital for life chances is examined in post-communist societies.
- The levels of intergenerational social mobility vary across 24 analysed countries.
- Intergenerational status reproduction was not substantively affected by post-communist transition.
- Parental education is more important than parental occupation for educational and occupational attainment.

Abstract

Regime change experienced in post-communist societies is of great significance for research in social stratification and mobility. Nonetheless, the existing literature does not provide a clear
