Highlights:

- Gender stereotypes seem to affect the perception and evaluation of female physicians' communication behavior more than is the case for male physicians.
- Male physicians obtain more credit when using patient-centered communication than female physicians.
- Female physicians have satisfied patients when they are able to adapt their behavior to their patients' expectations about the physician's communication style.

Abstract

Objective: This paper is based on a 2017 Baltimore International Conference on Communication in Healthcare (ICCH) plenary presentation by the first author and
