18 Historical management experiences of Mediterranean community-based fisheries were particularly 19 effective in fostering both social cohesion and sustainable utilisation of coastal resources. This figure 20 contrasts with the current status of Mediterranean fisheries, where about 90% of stocks are 21 overexploited. The key question then is: can past experiences guide our current approach to reshaping 22 governance in the Mediterranean fisheries? In our effort to answer this question, we analyzed the 23 main attributes of selected fishing governance systems in the Early and Mid-Modern period and their 24 evolution through time. We focussed on the Spanish Cofradías, the French Prud'homies and the
